Irony of US criticising China for its too-high savings rate
By Stephany Griffith-Jones and Francisco Rodriguez
Published: October 20 2005 03:00 | Last updated: October 20 2005 03:00

From Prof Stephany Griffith-Jones and Prof Francisco Rodriguez.

Sir, It seems rather audacious that the US Treasury team is calling for a wholesale and quick reform of Chinese financial institutions and policies ("US calls on China to open up finance sector", October 17).

China's strategy of gradual and controlled financial and capital account liberalisation has proved very effective in protecting it from the financial instability that has hit other emerging markets. So many developing economies - often influenced by Washington - liberalised the financial sector and the capital account rapidly; frequently these rapid liberalisations were soon after followed by major crises, crises that China has been able to avoid.

Furthermore, China's high savings rate is an important factor in explaining its outstanding growth performance. Theoretical and empirical research in the field of economic growth has emphasised the role of a country's savings in fostering economic development. It is therefore ironic that the US, with its very low savings rate - which is a significant factor in current global imbalances - is criticising the most successful developing economy for having too high a savings rate! It is a bit like General Motors telling Toyota how to become profitable.

Stephany Griffith-Jones,

Professorial Fellow,

IDS,

Sussex University,

Brighton BN1 9RE, UK

Francisco Rodriguez,

Professor of Economics,

Wesleyan University,

Middletown, CT 06457, US
Irony of US criticism of China for its too-high savings rates

[Link to article]